NATURE-INSPIRED products bring the garden indoors.

As urban populations rise, the call of the wild grows louder. Studies and campaigns like 30 Days Wild, an initiative of The Wildlife Trusts, show that daily contact with nature improves human health and happiness. And even though we can't always be trekking in the mountains or surfing the waves, designers are paying attention to these activities and inviting nature to enter our residential and commercial spaces. Aided by manufacturers, they use materiality, imagery and form in products that reference land, sea and sky. Their inventive work weaves Mother Nature into the fabric of interior design. — AM

According to designer Philipp Hainke, Organico lies 'somewhere between nature and technology'. Consisting of chairs and acoustic panels, the collection utilizes renewable organic resources. By pressing hemp fibres and shives through a calcium-hydroxide and casein-composed adhesive, Hainke sourced an innovative, sustainable material that makes not only his final result significant but also the process, which questions the way we think about materials and their life cycles.

Inspired by traditional Persian gardens, Golran's Garden of Eden, a new collection of rugs designed by India Mahdavi, comprises two models — or two gardens. While both depart from a pattern of smooth leaves, the first is rectangular in shape, while the second takes on a freer, more irregular form.
